NASCENCE

Createspace. Paperback. Condition: New. This item is printed on demand. 270 pages. Dimensions: 9.0in. x 6.0in. x 0.6in. In a post-apocalyptic world where humanity is on the verge of extinction and the remaining survivors are hunted by a race of scythe-armed alien hunters, what new beginnings can possibly exist, especially for one who has become mostly machine? Nascence takes readers on a journey with Ferroc, a sword- and pistol-wielding cyborg who is seeking Earth's few human survivors from an alien apocalypse while defending himself from its remaining hunters. Blessed with nanobots, micro-robotic cells, metal-plate skin, a de-atomizing regeneration chamber, and his own human memories of a family life before Earth's downfall, Ferroc is both a virtually immortal weapon and a conflicted soul who struggles daily with self-identification. Able, and often forced, to process observational data at hyper speeds, each of his subroutines are met with the question of why he survived, what purpose he has left in the world, and why the aliens see him as enemy, enigma, and seemingly worthy of reverence. If a life of combat and self-contemplation were not troubling enough, Ferroc encounters a self-assured woman named Sasha and a host of other companions that prove to challenge his own identity and his newfound understanding of relationships when it becomes evident that he may be the key piece to a puzzle that could change the world forever. Written in first-person, present-tense, the novel invites readers deep into the mind of Ferroc who must consider and calculate his every action to ensure his own survival and that of those around him, always against a backdrop of his attempt to evaluate his own existence. Nascence offers readers exciting combat scenes complete with an easily understood CPU-based perception and internal dialogue as well as technological adaptations that Ferroc can use to even...
