A summary of this work is presented, together with a discussion of results as published in Bulletin 153. Summary: The only satisfactory method of judging the economy of rations is to consider together all the controlling factors entering into the feeding operation. No single factor is a true measure of the economy of a ration. The great number of factors involved in cattle feeding makes it impossible, in a limited space, to clearly discuss Purdue Exp. Sta, Bulletin, 136. them in their numerous and complex combinations. Therefore, the discussion of the trials as a complete transaction is presented, with such variable factors as weight and cost of cattle, cost of gains, selling price of cattle and profit or loss per steer as they occurred during the trial: In the above summary, the...
