The club consisted of thirty members. Their names were as follows: This is a striking list of early Kentucky names. Some of the men at that time were officially connected with public offices in the District of Kentucky, and nearly all of them afterward held important offices of trust and honor in the State and General Governments. Brief biographical sketches of these earnest-minded men can not fail to impress even those to whom their names are unfamiliar, with the excellent material of the club, and a mention of some of their descendants will show that the weight and high character of the members have been transmitted to subsequent generations. Not only were they conspicuous in shaping the beginnings of a commonwealth, they were the ancestors of a race which has taken a large part in guiding its career. It will not be necessary...
