Excerpt from The Belforts of Culben Beneath the oak tree were two young men, the one swinging in a hammock and sending up rings of smoke from the briar-root pipe he was smoking, the other seated at a little cane table, elbows squared before him, hands clasped, on his face an expression of deep earnestness. Just as attitudes and occupations were markedly dissimilar, the figures themselves were in striking contrast; in one case the athlete was suggested, in the other the scholar. The loungee in the hammock was tall and broad-shouldered, clean-limbed and muscular, with a sun-tanned countenance on which sat the serene content of robust health. The youth at the table was of slender build; his long thin hands were wax like in their whiteness the face also was pale, with features delicately moulded, although it had a strength of its own, for the black, eager eyes imparted a glow from within, while the lofty brow bore the impress of commanding intellectuality.
