Excerpt: . . . from an entry in the registers of St. Eustache, being Thomas Quinault, maitre boulanger, et Perrine Riquier, sa femme, demeurants Rue de Grenelle. More fortunate than many of the bourgeoisie at that period, he received a good education, a circumstance which proves that Quinault pere was not under the necessity of sending him out to service. Before entering his teens he attracted the notice of Tristan, who, alive to his precocious intelligence and engaging manners, treated him with almost paternal tenderness. Naturally enough, he soon came to sympathize with the poet in his tastes and pursuits, and in the result Les Rivales was written. By means of the money he received for this work, with some added by Tristan, he was placed with an Avocat au Conseil. Nor was it simply by the success of this comedy that he justified the interest which Tristan...
