Les membranes amniotiques humaines constituent une entite tissulaire et fonctionnelle singuliere dont l integrite est indispensable au bon deroulement de la grossesse. Cependant les connaissances sur des processus comme l angiogenese, la proliferation, la differenciation, ou l apoptose restent fragmentaires et leurs mecanismes moleculaires de regulation sont a ce jour peu connus. Nous avons initie ce travail dans le but d explorer le role de la vitamine A dans la physiologie des membranes et l implication moleculaire des retinoïdes via leurs facteurs de transcription nucleaires. En premier lieu nous avons caracterise le profil d expression des differents acteurs moleculaires du metabolisme de la vitamine A. Deuxiemement, nous avons etudie un partenaire heterodimerisant avec RXR: LXR. Troisiemement, nous avons developpe des techniques permettant d identifier des genes cibles des retinoïdes potentiellement impliquees dans la physiopathologie membranaire. En conclusion, l etude du metabolisme du retinol et de ses genes cibles dans les membranes amniotiques, nous a permis d aborder la regulation moleculaire de processus physiopathologiques dans cette structure.
