R., At Irving Hall, March 25, 1868 It is with feelings of peculiar gratification that I appear before you this evening, to perform a duty to the hero-dead, and enjoy the pleasure of addressing you, in order to recall one of those prominent figures in the greatest war-picture of the world, whose memory you have honored by selecting his name as the denomination of your Post. To me this selection has given the liveliest satisfaction, since, brought up with him in a childless grandfather's house, we were united by ties stronger than those which often bind together men who are nearer in relationship. Throughout life these bonds were intensified by peculiar circumstances. There was a mutual confidence such as rarely exists except between brothers, and when Kearny went forth to play a distinguished part in the death-struggle for our national existence, my eldest son rode beside him as a trusted member of his staff. This son was with him when he marched forth from the...
