Excerpt: . . . action, and herein there is an essential difference between this case and that of Johnson v. Thorndike. The district had no legal right, under the circumstances then existing, to raise money by taxation to build a school-house on the lot where they did build it. It is not a question of expediency merely, as to the raising of money for that purpose, but one of legal right purely. Has any majority, less than two-thirds of a school district, the power under our statutes to locate a school-house, and raise money to build it, on a lot to which more than one-third of the voters present and voting object, and against which the appellate tribunal, created by the statute, have filed their decision The answer must be in the negative. -3. But it is suggested, that until after the reception of parol evidence of the...
