Excerpt from Annual Report of Intramural Activities: October 1, 1990 September 30, 1991 Niaid laboratories are actively engaged in developing new vaccines. Both classical and new methods are being employed. For example, in the classical approach microorganisms are being attenuated by applying molecular engineering techniques to modify protein determinants to render agents immunogenic but not pathogenic. This has been done for viruses such as dengue, in uenza A, rotavirus, respiratory syncytial virus and hepatitis A and C. As a result promising candidate vaccines for these agents are, or soon will be, available for testing in animals and man. Studies of simian immunodeficiency virus (siv) have resulted in a vaccine that protected monkeys from infection with free virus and the approach used for the siv model will be evaluated for a hiv vaccine. In other studies a candidate hiv vaccine, based on purified gpl60 envelope protein, is entering phase 1 clinical testing. A candidate vaccine for transmission blocking immunity against Falciparum malaria has been developed based on a recombinant antigen (pfs25) that was inserted into vaccinia. The vaccinia malarial antigen was capable of producing immunity in mice and monkeys and is now ready for phase 1 human trials. A vaccine for chlamydia, using the major outer membrane protein of chlamydia as the immunogen, has been developed and shown to protect monkeys from the ocular consequences of infection. This new chlamydia vaccine is ready to be assessed in animal models for protection against genital infection and hopefully will be available for phase 1 clinical studies in humans in the near future.
