Excerpt from The Measurement of Ability to Read: A Manual of Directions Concerning Giving and Scoring of Reading Tests, Statistical Treatment of the Data and Diagnosis of School, Class, and Individual Needs There is probably no subject in the school curriculum in which there is a greater need for adequate tests with which to measure the accomplishment of children than in reading. A child's progress through school depends to a very large extent upon his ability to get a maximum of the thought out of the printed page in the smallest amount of time possible. His advancement in school is likely to be seriously hindered if he does not promptly acquire the ability to read with understanding and with reasonable rapidity. To discover early in the school course the pupils who are not succeeding in mastering the art of reading and apply remedial measures is of the utmost importance, both on account of the advantage to the child himself and also from the point of view of financial economy. It is desirable to measure reading ability in a scientific and objective manner in every school (1) for the purpose of determining the efficiency and progress of the pupils by comparison with proper standards for each grade, (2) to diagnose the needs of the class as a whole, and especially the individual needs of particular pupils, in order that future instruction may have a definite aim - that of remedying actual defects which are known to exist and not some fancied deficiencies which are thought to prevail, - and (3) to evaluate different methods of instruction.
