Rusgenproject, Division of Sepmc.com. Paperback. Condition: New. 60 pages. Dimensions: 11.7in. x 8.3in. x 0.1in. Upon creation of communication networks, people called their content information and started to deal with this content as with any routine and commonplace objects - produce, consume, distribute, store, sell and buy. There are electronic markets, electronic media, e-mail, social and gaming networks, where people are building almost a full life with its economy, politics, psychology . . . and pathology. E-life generates huge amount of texts, which are archived and stored. These texts contain, perhaps, the answers to all questions, as well as those questions. In principle, if only I knew how, from this array we are likely to gain all that knowledge of humankind. If you would just know how. Someday search algorithms will achieve a degree of perfection that we will no longer have the problem of the search itself. But its a belief of only the most hardcore programmers. Information experts, discussing their small applied problems, gradually expand horizons and start philosophizing, with not much of reflection. Talk about taxonomy, ontologies, hierarchy, as well as attempts to give these philosophical notions the operational form, little by little have become commonplace among the advanced specialists, who act as creators of the new information philosophy. Publications of this kind would rather replenish arrays of texts already stored in the network than solve the problem of searching the content of these networks. Nevertheless, the drift from technological to philosophical attempts at solutions is very indicative. But its focus is doubtful, because philosophizing was, is and will be no more than just philosophizing. Another thing is to try to understand what tool could be drawn from the information contained in the philosophical texts, including those devoted to the philosophy of information. Such intent is equally justified,...
