Horace, bring papa that newspaper that lies on the table yonder, Mr. Dinsmore said to his little son. The child, seated in his own little chair by his mother's side, was listlessly turning the leaves of a picture-book. Elsie had just finished her recitations for the morning, and was now sitting on the other side of Rose, taking a lesson in fancy-work. Mr. Dinsmore had spoken in a pleasant tone, rather of request than command, yet Horace, though usually ready to obey promptly and cheerfully, sat perfectly still, as if he had not heard, or did not choose to heed. Horace, do you hear me? Go and bring me that paper, said his father; and this time the tone was one of stern command. The child's face instantly assumed a stubborn, sullen expression, while he neither...
