Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from A Course in Normal Histology, Vol. 1: A Guide for Practical Instruction in Histology and Microscopic Anatomy The brilliant progress made in microscopy during the last three to four decades has gradually brought with it a total change in the course of histologic instruction. In former days the student himself prepared his own microscopic specimens with razor and needle and with the aid of a few solutions for maceration, hardening and staining. To-day, after recognizing the inefficiency of such methods, this work has almost entirely been taken from the student s hands. Instead he receives from the assistant or preparator more or less immaculate specimens, preserved, cut and stained; some only for a single observation, others as his property. The practical course has been replaced by one of demonstration; at any rate in all its essential phases. Special courses have been designed for instruction in the technique of microscopy, with the result that such courses have but a minimum percentage of attendance. By far the majority of our students enter the clinical semesters without being...
