Excerpt from The Home Market and the Federal Surplus In the administration of finance the revenue should not rise above the expenditure. If substantial equality can not be maintained, a slight deficit is preferable to a marked excess, since the latter subjects the government to the reproach of an unjust tax-gatherer. Yet a surplus is sometimes taken as a sign of government wealth; in truth it is rather a Sign of unthrift on the part of the tax payer. This notion of government wealth is in itself the parent of misconceptions which go to the root of our democratic institutions. Our government possesses no wealth which can be applied to general public wants. And this not alone in the abstract sense that in a democratic state as the government itself is of the people so are its possessions, but in the fact that the property to which the government holds title is not a source of net income. The government owns ships, buildings, material, etc., practically inconvertible. It holds the title to a vast domain which as a financial investment has proved a failure, since the cost of its acquisition and develop ment already exceeds the receipts from sales by about This domain has been at times treated as a source of general revenue; again, as the spoil of corpora tions; but the true policy is to develop the land for its highest destination, its purchase at low, even nominal prices, by actual settlers who in time build up self-sup porting States.
