These sprung from the Waldenses of Dauphine and Piedmont, and, together with tbo Calabrians, had emigrated from their over-populous valleys to a wild desert, which, by their industry and the blessing of God, they soon rendered prolific in corn, wine, oil, chestnuts, and other fruits. These poor people had long been under the iron hand of Popery; for, at a meeting of Bishops at Avignon, in 1228, the Inquisitors reported that they had taken and apprehended so large a number of them, that they were not only at a loss to provide food for their subsistence, but also to procure lime and stone euough to build prisons for them. In 1506 an attempt was made to prejudice Lewis XII. against them; but that truly illustrious Monarch, whose name deserves to be coupled with that of Henry IV. would not condemn1 them without first examining into their characters; aud having sent Monsieur Adam Fumee, Master of the Requests, to obtain the necessary information, he returned so just a 3 report of their harmless and industrious lives, that the King took them under his protection, and bestowed upon them the highest encomiums. When the reign of Francis commenced, these people, having lost their protector, were again subjected to the enemies of true religion. Some member or other of them-was daily summoned before the Parliament of Aix, and condemned to be hanged or burnt, or dismissed with a brand in the forehead. At...
