Philosophiam legat moralem vel metaphysicam, indicates an union of studies occupying a very different position in public opinion now, from that which they held when this Statute was first enacted. Mortua quinetiam jungebat corpora vivis, will be the natural exclamation of many a student, fresh from recollections of the recent history of British Philosophy, or of the animadversions of sundry modern critics. For while Moral Philosophy, in this country, and especially in this University, has constantly exhibited an active, sometimes even a noisy vitality, and has boasted from generation to generation a goodly array of admirers, students, and expositors. Metaphysics, for upwards of a century, has been suffered to lie in obscurity, or has been occasionally exhumed only for the...
