Dissecting Black Self-Esteem There s Black empowerment, and then there s Black self-hate. Have you ever wondered why some Black people develop a healthy sense of racial identity and others do not? Some people assume self-hating people weren t raised right. May be they didn t have enough positive Black experiences, friends, or role models. Is that really true for everyone? Could it be more complex? This personal essay examines questions like: Why are some Black people empowered and others filled with self-hate and internalized racism? Is this the result of their environment? Can you raise a Black child in an all white school? Can you raise a Black child in an all white church? Is Black self-hate the fault of the media? Is there something wrong with a Black child who is only attracted to white people? What effect does a pro-Black household have on a Black child? Should a Black child be taught to fight over the n-word? Do any of those factors lead to Black self-hate? What are the symptoms of Black self-hate? Every day, people live with the subtle effects of racism, anti-Blackness and white supremacy. They suffer not only with injustice and economic disparities but with self-hate. This personal essay will speak to those who believe that Black self-esteem is an important part of liberation and equality. But first, an understanding of the causes and symptoms of Black-self hate must be uncovered, and some myths must be dispelled. Explore and examine these questions in this personal essay about Black self-hate.
