Not illustrated. 1919 Excerpt: .to join in the struggle had been brought to submission, but now obstruction to the government and propaganda for internationalism was popular politics with the Socialists and syndicalists. The emergencies of the war had given rise to special temporary measures for the employment, shelter, payment, feeding, and general care of employees in munition works and manufactories, but in April apart from the government's eight-hour day and reconstruction methods of housing, neither employers nor the wage-workers seemed to have drawn therefrom any ideas of general application for permanent working class betterment or even for promoting a workable truce between the two sides of the labor question. In the five months since the armistice most of the methods of organization and administration in practice during the war in private and government establishments producing war supplies became no longer operative. While some measures had been heroic, being military as to discipline and in every respect vigorously applied to the one purpose of saving France, they had brought to the country little in point of established industrial efficiency or even of improved sentiments between the buyers and sellers of labor that were to be carried over to the times of peace. There was emphatically nothing new in France in the sense either of a systematically improved relationship between the employer and employed classes or of the introduction of new social or governmental machinery to bring together practical and reasonable representatives for the common purposes of production, trade agreements or...
