The members of the church at Corinth could not fail to take notice of the allusion, or to perceive the lesson which the apostle would have them learn from the fact mentioned in the text. For ages the Isthmian games had been celebrated, with great splendour, almost within the precincts of their city. No one was permitted to enter the lists, unless he had submitted to the prescribed discipline: and no one was crowned, however successful, unless he conformed in all respects to the established rules. During the contests, the combatants were encouraged by the presence and the applause of the immense concourse assembled, from all parts of Greece, to witness their exploits, and to bear home in triumph the successful competitor. To these things the Apostle also alludes in his 2nd Epistle to Timothy; and again in the Epistle to the Hebrews.
