Excerpt from The Latin School Register, Vol. 15: October, 1895 Grove and so on to Prescott, where I could connect with the Atlantic and Pacific and reach the Headquarters of the firm at Santa Fe. With a day before me I sauntered idly about the town. It was an exact fac-simile of every other Arizona town I had visited, with its store, where the mail was delivered, its dusty green or Open area of sand, around which were grouped the main buildings of the settlement, the small court-house, the still smaller station. The heat of the August sun was powerful, - and Arizona heat is indeed terrific! The very air seemed to burn, and the parched plain, stretching afar in the distance, was like the top of a hot stove, from which the fumes of torrid warmth quivered up into the air. The sky was cloudless, blue, vast. Not a speck could be seen except some distant vul ture, sailing out of human vision in burning space.
