Every woman is attracted to the scent of danger, Mac McDougle says. Women are attracted to the gifted gunfighter, whose career is dedicated to ridding the West of murderers, molesters and oppressors of the weak or defenseless. The dashing handsome young man from New Mexico begins his career by saving a ravishing Asian Princess in Chinatown, killing four brigands trying to kidnap the girl. Mac is rewarded by her powerful gangster grandfather, Master Khan, who tells the New Mexican he must quit college and return home. If he remains in San Francisco, the kidnappers will track him down and force him to eat testicle soup-with Mac providing the main ingredient. Mac finds this persuasive. Before he flees, Master Khan rewards McDougle with cash, twelve matching diamonds and a ring with an enormous ruby from the Princess own finger. The Gunfighter wears it on a gold chain as a talisman the remainder of his adventurous life. Returning home to the family orchard near La Aldea de la Felicidad (Village of Happiness), Mac s incredible gun skills lead him to a career of rendering justice to evildoers-without all those pesky legalities. McDougle s good looks, charm and gentlemanly demeanor help him become the security consultant to the wealthy, charging one thousand dollars per head. A feature of Mac s service is that he performs his assignments without unseemly public shootouts and leaves no unsightly bodies. No body; no crime, is the hallmark of his work. When he leaves the locale of a project, all that remain are his nom de guerre (phony name) and the glow in the hearts of the young lovelies he has charmed. Then Mac s dull, sober,...
