C Instances, to regale themselves on these delicacies at the houses of their friends in the town. When the market was over, Ulsford relapsed into its wonted repose and neatness; but beauty it had not. The market-place, with its centre stone cross, was a good-sized square, from which short and not very wide streets stretched away. The church and vicarage were in the principal street. The post-office, the magistrates' offices, and the small bank, with the market-hall and the best shops, were in the market-place. Some small inns were dispersed about the town - one especially noticeable in our story was the nearest to the market-place, but in a bye street, and was the most modest in appearance of them all. It was called The Traveller's Rest, and its accommodation was in keeping with its unpretending name; a rest it was, clean and wholesome, for those who required it, but they were of the humbler class, and no gentry were ever seen within its doors. It was a place of call for carriers, and did a little business of its own in that line. It was kept by one Ned Staples and his wife Sally, a homely pair who believed in the adage of early to bed and early to rise.
