Excerpt from The Life of George Washington, Vol. 2 of 4 Just then a guard-boat, belonging to the Lizard, came slowly along shore and discovered them. They hailed it and ordered it to land. Not complying, it was fired into, and three men were killed. The boat instantly pulled for the frigate, giving vociferous alarm. Without waiting the arrival Of the residue of his men, for whom the canoes had been despatched, Arnold led those Who had landed to the foot of the cragged defile, once scaled by the intrepid volfe, and scrambled up it in all haste. By daylight he had planted his daring ?ag on the far-famed heights of Abraham. Here the main difficulty stared him in the face. A strong line of walls and bastions traversed the promontory from one of its precipitous sides to the other; enclosing the upper and lower towns. On the right the great bas tion of Cape Diamond crowned the rocky height Of that name. On the left was the bastion of La Potasse, close by the gate of St. Johns opening upon the barracks; the gate where Wolfe s antagonist, the gallant Montcalm, received his death-wound. A council of war was now held. Arnold, who had some knowledge Of the place, was for dashing forward at once and storming the gate Of St. Johns. Had they done so, they might have been successful. The gate was Open and unguarded. Through some blunder and delay, a message from the commander Of the Lizard to the lieutenant governor had not yet been delivered, and no alarm had reached the fortress. The formidable aspect Of the place, however, awed Arnold s associates in council. They considered that...
