It gave me a queer feeling to realize I was much higher than Rainier and practically alone, for my guide did not know one word of English. To make the realization more acute the volcano let out another sullen blast when I was half way up. I could see nothing but could hear rock hitting the slope not far away. We noticed fresh scoops in the icy slope, soup plate size, made by falling rock. My creepers, made for sandals, had an uncomfortable habit of working loose and the guide had to adjust them while I stood, as there was no place to rest on the slope. We kept a slow, steady gait and about 10 a. m. reached the rim, 17, 794 feet above sea level, and peered down into a seething, angry hole, hissing, muttering, moaning. Sulphur smoke poured out of vents on the sides and the smoke was so dense below I could see nothing but violent agitation of what may have been smoke, but looked like some boiling material. The bottom of the crater was not the only thing that was agitated, consequently my impression may not be altogether accurate, but it looked about three hundred feet to the bottom and about three times that across. I shot my last films at my guide standing on the rim, and then sat down on the outer slope where heat had melted away all snow and ice. Just as I...
